This editorial could, indeed, start on a self-congratulatory note on having achieved the second year of publication. On second thoughts it may be as well to leave such euphoria for the first issue of Volume 10!

In September, the AIT returned to its pattern of meetings, the first being on IT and Consultancy. Ably put together by John Hawgood and David Booth its proceedings are published in this issue, also ably edited by the same pair. There was only one slight disagreement between them and myself and that was on the publication of the discussion.

They felt that it was not worthy of publication while I took the opposite view as I believe that it records the flavour of the audience's reaction to the papers. I won.

In addition, Elisabeth Somogyi and Robert Galliers give us a historical perspective on the applications of IT, while Ian Bryant provides a personal view of IT and adult education. In the news section we publish a reminder of things to come and encourage members to sample the discussions themselves by coming to the meetings.
